

NEW POLICIES CERTAIN WITH COLBY SEATED

There would be peace just as soon as a joint resolution was passed and signed by the president or adopted over his veto—all of which is admittedly difficult since the president is insistent that the treaty of Versailles be voted upon in the autumn elections. On the other hand, congress could by joint resolution revoke the wartime powers of the president and repeal all war legislation but this could have been done by congress on the day the armistice was signed and is a matter of domestic legislation entirely irrespective of an agreement with an enemy.

Will Show Up Fallacy.

There is little indication that President Wilson will let congress by a joint resolution give the impression that it has done as much as a treaty of peace could do to get the country back on a peace basis. He will unquestionably emphasize that a policy of involuntary isolation keeps the United States off the reparation commission and enables the European powers to divide up the commerce of Europe as they please and to arrange for financial adjustments in Europe without consulting the United States.

Nobody has been let in on the White House plans thus far, but that Mr. Wilson intends to keep the fight on the treaty going is apparent from statements made by many persons hitherto familiar with his point of view. Mr. Wilson realizes, no doubt, that he is beaten so far as the senate is concerned, but with a man who believes the senate doesn't represent the American people's true wishes, there is little prospect of an absolute surrender of the whole thing with the simple process of approving a joint resolution by congress.

In executive quarters the joint resolution idea isn't taken seriously because of the intention to puncture it full of holes as soon as the plan is up for debate in both houses. Then will come an avalanche of arguments and objections from the White House, which may make congress pause. The simple little business of allowing official documents and passports by the thousands to lie unsigned has the effect of hastening the senate's action on the Colby nomination and it is similarly doubtful whether congress will care to take the responsibility for any adverse developments in the foreign trade situation that might affect America's financial stability.

Is Desperate Game.

The political game is a desperate one this year and there are people here who actually look forward to a financial crash as a result of the chaos in Germany and the reluctance of the United States to put her shoulder to the wheel and assist through the League of Nations in the enforcement and operation of the peace treaty. All the economic ills that may visit this country between now and next autumn are to be blamed by the Democrats on the treaty situation and that's why they hardly will aid in getting a joint resolution through congress to simplify matters, though there are some folks in administration circles who believe that the passage of a joint resolution would be helpful in defining exactly by a process of elimination how much responsibility for economic troubles can be attributed to the failure of the senate to ratify a treaty or participate in the League of Nations. The Republicans are not a bit feared by this, for though some of them admit as Senator Harding did, that the benefits to be derived by the ratification of the treaty with reservations are now lost, they will continue to insist that the responsibility for the whole business lies entirely in the uncompromising disposition of the Democratic incumbent of the White House.

In the Day's News

Colonel W. P. Greeley, who has been selected to succeed Henry S. Graves as chief of the United States forest service, has been in the forest service continuously since 1904, except for two years of military service with the American expeditionary forces. Colonel Greeley is 40 years old and a native of California. Entering the forest service in a minor capacity he rose through all the grades until he became assistant chief. When the United States entered the world war he was assigned the task of recruiting the forestry troops for service in France. Later he was given command of the forestry section of the American expeditionary forces, in charge of 10,000 forestry troops which were engaged in lumbering operations in every part of France. For the distinguished services he rendered in this position Colonel Greeley was decorated by both the French and British governments.
